TRAINING FOR A DIVER -A SEVERE SCHOOL of training is requisite before a man can become an expert diver, and indeed there are some men who are so escentituted paysically that it is im possible for them to remain in the armor under water. The a mospheric pressure at the sur face is lifteen pounds for every square inch of the body, and on the average mae is sen e hing like fiftees cons, but the outside and in ide pressure being equal, this immense weight is unpotic d. At every thirty four feet of descent under water this pressure is increased, one at mesotere, or the additional pressure of fifteen pruces to the quare isch, and as it is absolutely necessary to have the air pressure in the armor fully qual to that of the water, some idea can be had of what the diver must withstand, even at the moderate depth of thirly four feet, although the linhaling of this com pressed air in a measure relieves the upplessant

When the distance is increased to a ! undred and a hundred and fifty feat, the sensation be comes almost unendurable; the blocd starts from the eyes, ears and mouth, and even from the pores of the skin, and on returning to the sur face extreme exhaust n is the result. An inexperienced man can only remain under water ten misutes at a very shall w depth, but by constant practice he is enabled to increase this time. The greatest depth that is ever attained is one hundred and fifty feet, and then the most experience d diver can remain at this point but greatest variety. five or six minutes without serious injury. Divers co to this depth only to a cure pricles of great value, remaining long coough to attach a chain or rope; as a hundred feet an old diver can remain about an hour, and at finy feet from four to six hours, according to the strength of the diver.
